How to Solve a Crime Part 2—Tiffany B. Saul
Television and movies have captured public interest and sparked imagination regarding the ways science can be used to solve crimes. This course will allow participants to explore the various disciplines of forensic science through hands-on activities, along with discussions about real-life applications of science in forensic investigations and how these compare to popular media representations. Participants will be able to apply their knowledge of these techniques to mock crime scenes throughout the course and step into the roles of forensic experts.

10:45 a.m.–12:15 p.m.,
The Lost Art of Listening—Janet McCormick
Participants in these sessions will examine the concept of listening and its impact on communication by exploring the role of listening in human communication as a cognitive process, a social function, and a critical professional competency. Participants will be introduced to the theory and research of listening scholarship, as well as strategies designed to help build practical skills in achieving desired outcomes in effective listening. This course will take an experiential approach to listening instruction while providing extensive practical applications within the context of a sound theoretical framework. Participants will develop an understanding of the listening process and gain powerful listening skills.

12:30–1:45 p.m.,
Trail of Tears Indian Removal in Tennessee—Ashley Riley Sousa
Tennessee has historically been a crossroads of Native American trade and diplomacy—and home to some of the most powerful Indian nations in the Southeast. It is also currently one of a handful of American states with no remaining federally recognized Indian nations or reservation lands. What happened? This course will explore the history of Indian Removal and the Trail of Tears in Tennessee, emphasizing the political, economic, and cultural factors that shaped United States Indian policy in the Removal era, as well as the impact of Removal on the Native American nations of Tennessee.
